Warchalking

Collaboratively creating a hobo-language for free wireless networking.

Sections: Home, Everything, News, Symbol Workshop, Resources, Pics and Locations, Diaries.

Welcome to Warchalking! Warchalking is the practice of marking a series of symbols on sidewalks and walls to indicate nearby wireless access. That way, other computer users can pop open their laptops and connect to the Internet wirelessly. It was inspired by the practice of hobos during the Great Depression to use chalk marks to indicate which homes were friendly.

First things first: Is this legal? Moral? Check out our Warchalking Legality FAQ for some thoughts. Below is a continually-updated list of Warchalking news and thoughts, all contributed by users like you. And if you create an account and log in (see the sidebar on the right) then you can help decide which submissions make it to the front page and which don't. Every story has a forum for comments and questions underneath it, where you can contribute your own thoughts.

If you like this site, then you can subscribe by RSS or email! It'll save you the trouble of having to come back every day, by bringing the latest news right to you.

Finally, if you have any further questions or comments, don't hesitate to ask.

Borrowing Bandwidth in San Jose, CA

by bandwidthuser, Mon Apr 21st, 2003 at 10:46:42 PM EST (Pictures and Locations)

I am a newbie to the world of warchalking or its more like borrowing bandwidth from the neighbors. I live in San Jose, CA and happen to get connected to a network accidentally.
